Beyond the Perf

Stamp creators reveal how they solved key design challenges.

Sketch Initial artwork focused on developing connections.

Rendering 1 For visual interest, the stamp title was rendered in glow-in-the-dark letters.

Rendering 2 The stamp was imagined as a circuit board with letters soldered to the pegs.

Final Expanding on the idea from Rendering 2, holographic foil was used to outline the letters.

How do you design a stamp that feels perpetually new?

Representing the concept of innovation was a challenge for stamp art director and designer Antonio Alcalá. He needed to find an image that would evoke a feeling of newness — but newness that would last.

Although it's an image that can feel timeless in its representation of new ideas, “a light bulb as a symbol for innovation seemed a bit generic,” Alcalá says. “At the same time, a particular technology which seemed innovative when beginning the project could be dated by the time the stamps were released. Can you imagine if we had worked to issue an innovation stamp featuring a flip phone when those first became popular? By the time the stamp was issued, the world would have moved on to smart phones and USPS would have looked like the opposite of innovative.”

In the end, Alcalá and the postal art team decided to show details from five different photographs, each representing an area in which U.S. scientists and engineers have made significant contributions. By zooming in on some of the shapes, colors, and textures that make up each image — from the bold pink spheres of immune system cells to the intricate patterns of dots and lines that cover a circuit board — Alcalá and the team created stamp designs that feel enduringly fresh. To enhance that effect, they also decided to superimpose the word “INNOVATION” on each stamp, with the letters stacked in a dynamic, non-linear arrangement that evokes originality.

“I thought the design itself should feel a bit innovative,” Alcalá says.
